Address of Colonel John W Forney, at Franklin, July 4th. Colonel Forney, after a few introductor; remarks, in which he stated that be did not propose to direct his remarks in the channel usually taken by orators on the 4th of July, said: Joseph Jefferson, the actor, has given to mankind a picture of his personation of "Rip-Van-Winkle," which grows in favor with every repitition, and will survive in the memory long after the sensational drams has been forgotten. Its very sim-plicity is a main element of its enduring popularity. The story itself is nothing. In many respects it is unreal; but the language is the language of the heart, and the interpreter seems to have been created expressly to add to its pathos. No such see can be seen on the modern stage s

Jefferson's in Rip-Van-Winkle; no such voice can be heard, and no completer fidelity to nature. Those who witness this exquisite deline ation once are auxious to witness, it again and again; and many who shun the theatre as the temple of wiokedness enjoy it nightly, and never tire of the delightful iteration. Sir Frederick Bruce, the British Minister at Washington, who preceded Mr. Thornton, and Thaddons Stevens were nightly visitors when poor old Rip was personated. Both have now passed to their eternal rest, as if to try the truth of the maxim that always brings tears to so many eyes, when Jefferson, on his return to the village of "Falling Watere," after his twenty years' theep, exclaims, in broken accents: "Alas! how soon we are forgot-en when we are gone !" But is it quite true that we are so soon forgotten? I hope not. I believe not. Are we not told that the "actions of the Are we not told that the "actions of the just emell aweet and blossom in the dust?" Gratitude is not the growth of the moment. It is a fixed and lasting quality. Nor is it exceptional. It outlives in an aurvives death, and prelongs the name of the good man and of his good deeds through an endless future. Linked with affection, it preserves the features of these walls and sand sandiffes to remote general. we love, and sanotifies to remote genera tions the patriot, the philunthropist, and

As I look over this happy sceno and a bie diary : study the surrounding triumphs of modern source and modern enterprise, it is not discoult to recall many, now in their graves, who may be classed among the unforgotten and the profoundly cherished. Their virtues, their peculiarities, their very forms and features, come back to me as I stand here, in the midst of their posterity, with a freshness that proves that they can never be wholly erased from the volume of the brain and the memory of the heart. And nothing in this age of marvels lifts it so completely out of the oblivion of other days as the passion of our people to revive the worthy deeds of their ancestors. Assisted by the magical agency of printing, these deeds are constantly in our view. The example of that greatest of all our Republics, New Eogland, in which every county has its competent historian, and every man of note or of usefulness, is being copied in Pennsylvania, so that in another decade we shall have our claims to eminence, and in fact to pre-eminence, oblivion of other days as the passion of to eminence, and in fact to pre-eminence in all that relates to wealth of soil, variety d general and individual improvement set jorth by our own some for the encouragement of generations unborn.

To me there is nothing so full of delicious compensation as the restoration of the worthy works of other men. There is not a township in this, our good old State, in which one or more of these instances may not be unburied as a wholesome leading to the contract of the state of t aon. Our experience is not old; it does not run back into the midst of tradition; it is not encumbered with the story of anment ware and crimes; we do not trace our progress to pictures a thousand years old, in architectures diversified as the ages, the names of whose designers and builders have faded beyond all hope of
